Mr. Hooker (Miss.) took the floor to add his argument in favor of Washington as the World's Fair site. He spoke of that city as the chief seat of Government, as non-partisan in character and as not so very far from other great cities.

He asserted that the credit for introducing the Fair project to the public was due to Washington.

Arguments in opposition to the Fair were then begun by Mr. Mills, of Texas. Mr. Mills prefaced his remarks by a review of the rise and growth of America's present greatness, which he ascribed to the independence and individuality of her citizens.

He autagenized the proposed Fair as an encroachment of the Government on the people and States. The Constitution forbids building churches or making creeds by the Government, and the same principle was involved in this project. He characterized it as a money-making

"It comes," he said. " with the old flag in one hand, and an appropriation in the other. If the people want a fair in New York they can have it just as they would organize a bank, or build a railroad, by individual energy and capital. So with Chicago and St. Louis."
